Memos from CDC to White House lay out rationale for possible widespread use of face coverings

March 31, 2020 By Lena H. Sun and Laurie McGinley

Federal officials debating whether to recommend that face coverings be routinely worn in public are responding to increasing evidence that infected people without symptoms can spread the coronavirus, according to internal memos provided to the White House by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

CDC considering recommending general public wear face coverings in public

March 30, 2020 By Joel Achenbach, Lena H. Sun and Laurie McGinley

Should we all be wearing masks? That simple question is under review by officials in the U.S. government and has sparked a grass-roots pro-mask movement. But there's still no consensus on whether widespread use of facial coverings would make a significant difference, and some infectious disease experts worry that masks could lull people into a false sense of security and make them less disciplined about social distancing.
